READING TERMINAL MARKET, A PHILADELPHIA TRADITION

Above: Poultry stand in Reading Terminal Market, circa 1930s.

In 1892 the Reading Railroad opened the Reading Terminal Market below the tracks of their massive new train shed. The 78,000 square foot Market held nearly 800 spaces for vendors and was touted as the greatest food market in the world.

Through the years, the Market survived and thrived by adapting to new innovations and changes in consumer trends and economic climate. However, when the Reading Railroad went bankrupt in 1971, the Market began a long decline. By the late 1970s, the roof leaked, the building was in disrepair and only about 23 merchant stands remained open.

Beginning in the 1980s, the Reading Company devoted renewed attention to the Market — and so began a dramatic turnaround. New merchants were recruited, including a group of Amish merchants from Lancaster County, some of whom remain today. In 1984, trains stopped running to the station above the Market and the city's commuter rail system was re-routed to bypass the old Reading Terminal. In 1990 the building was sold to the newly-formed Pennsylvania Convention Center Authority, who re-built the Market to strict historic preservation standards. The Authority also set up a non-profit management company to run the Market and maintain its historical integrity.

Today, the Market is home to nearly 80 independently-owned small businesses representing a great diversity of nationalities. Each day they offer an unparalleled variety of local and imported fresh foods, groceries and prepared meals. More than 100,000 Philadelphians and visitors pass through the Reading Terminal Market every week, enjoying its exceptional products, history and people. Reading Terminal Market, as it has for more than a century, offers personal, neighborhood shopping and still has something for everyone.
